THE RED SUNSETS OF 1884.

An Explanatory Argument Concerning The red sunsets which were so conspicuous a year ago have excited this autumn great attention in both hemispheres. The various theories propounded to account for the phenomenon, especially that which attributed the sky glows to vast clouds of voleaule dust discharged at the eruption of Krakatoa in August, 1883, seems to have lost ground, and some new hypothesis is needed to clear up the mysery. The English astronomer Mr. rations of a red corona round the sun "is still plainly visible which, he says, "is still plainly viella in England." "It has been habitum, adds, "for me to scan the neighbor ood of the sun for balos during twen-y-five years, and I never observed it revious to the date mentioned"-No-The reddish halo to which Mr. Backhouse has called attention has been this fall noticed by several observers. An English scientist, Mr. E. Donglas Archibald, visiting the summis of Mount Washington on Soptember 5th, at sun rise, noted, 'in maddition to the usual surrise effects, a large circle of rosy purple haze situated about lifteen degrees above the horizon, and apparently having no connection with the yellow and red horizontal bands beneath it." Though this observer had witnessed the sun rising from various titudes up to twelve thousand feet, he had never seen anything so curious as the survise on Mount Washington. His suggestion is that the rosy solar halo has of late become so conspicuous be-cause, while the sunrise and sunser glows have exhibited a marked decline duration and brilliancy since 1883, the halo has undergone no similar dim-inution of intensity, and thus attracts more attention relatively than it did at first. This explanation of the recent glows appears to be satisfactory as for as it goes; but astronomers will have to explain why, if the phenomenon is due to terrestrial dust floating in the upper atmosphere, it has been so rarely re-

There is no one thing, perhaps, in which the difference between the wellored man and the ill-bred man more appears than in the manner in which, he place where, and the time when they smoke. The well-bred man does not smoke, nor does in seem to shoke to show off; whereas the III-bred man very often smokes in a self-conscious manner that seems to say: "Look at mel see how skillfully my lips hold tals eight; how I can shift it from one side the other without touching it with my figures, and how I can articulate with It in my month; in short, look you what perfect control I have over my tabul muscles, and, having seen, ad-mire!" In short, there are many low-bred young men -very many -that apsear to smoke only to display their Ohio Oli Mili in Harshmanville, was struck with a heavy lever that was caught in a rapidly revolving spur-wheef.
